One of the most important aspects of learning English is pronunciation. Without a clear pronunciation, it's hard to make yourself understood. First, start by studying individual sounds. After that, focus on the music of the language. You may be surprised by the following statement: the pronunciation of each word correctly leads to poor pronunciation! Good pronunciation comes from emphasizing the right words, it's because English is a stressful language. In other words, some words - the content of words - receive more attention, while other words - functional words - are less important. Difficulty: Difficult time is required: Options start by studying individual sounds. They are called phonemes. Use minimal pairs to train individual vowel sounds. Minimum pairs are words that change only one sound. For example, pop - sprightly - peep - Dad changes vowel sound. Using minimal vapors helps isolate sound to really focus on small changes in sounds between vowels. Examine the pairs of consonants who are voiced and voiceless and practice through minimal pairs. For example, /f/ sound 'f' headless and voiced 'v'. You can recognize the difference between voice and voice by putting your finger on your throat. Voiced sounds vibrate, while voiceless sounds do not vibrate. These pairs include: b/r - z/s - d/t - v/f - zh/sh - dj/ch. Find out the difference between clean vowels and diphthongs, such as 'oi' in 'boy' or 'aee' in 'tray'. Learn the following pronunciation rules: English is considered a strained language, while many other languages are considered syllables. In other languages, such as French or Italian, each syllable gets the same value (there is stress, but each syllable has its own length). English pronunciation focuses on specific stressed words, quickly gliding on other, un-stressed words. Stressed words are considered to be the content of words: nouns, for example, kitchen, Peter-(most) basic verbs, such as visit, build-adjectives, such as beautiful, interesting-Adverbs, for example, often, carefully un-stressed words are considered functional words: Determinators, for example, a-had verbs, such as mornings, were, for example, before, for example, connections, for example, read the following sentence aloud: Beautiful mountain appeared at a distance. Now read the following sentence out loud: He can come on Sundays until he has to do any homework in the evening. Note that the first sentence actually takes about the same time to speak well! Although the second sentence is about 30% longer than the first, the proposals take the same time to speak. This is because there are five stressed words in each sentence. Write down a few sentences, or take a few suggestions from a book or exercise. First, emphasize the emphatic words, then read aloud, focusing on the words emphasized and gliding through the non-implicit words. You'll be surprised at how fast your your improves! By focusing on the words emphasized, the un-stressed words and syllables take their more muted character. As you listen to native speakers, focus on how these speakers emphasize certain words and start copying it. Remember that non-tense words and syllables are often swallowed on English. Always focus on pronunciation stressed words good, non-tense words can be sliding over. Don't focus on the pronunciation of each word. Focus on the underlined words in each sentence. If you're heading to a city in southeast Louisiana near the Gulf of Mexico and don't know exactly how you should address the place without embarrassing yourself, you'll want to consult with locals on how to say it Name. Nicknamed the Big Easy, New Orleans is known for its 24-hour nightlife, vibrant live music scene, and spicy, singular cuisine, reflecting its history as a melting pot of French, African and American cultures, according to Google. But that melting pot of dialects lends itself to variations on the pronunciation of the city's name, making it difficult to know the correct way to say it. Indeed, it is useful to first know about many ways not to pronounce New Orleans. The correct way to pronounce the name of this city is New Or-linz (the Merriam-Webster dictionary writes it or-'l-nz). If you want people to understand you and treat you as a local, this is the way to pronounce it, although there are a few other options that are acceptable as well. Rainer Puster/Getty Images You may have heard the name pronounced, N'awlins, but it's more of a tourist thing to do, just like pronunciation of Houston Street in New York as a city in Texas, not as a-stone. You will often hear this mispronunciation in the period of film and production as it was only a popular pronunciation until the 1950s. Louis Armstrong crooned did you know what it means to skip New Orleans, pronouncing the last syllable with a stiff e sound rather than a soft i sound. The same pronunciation appeared in a number of songs before and after, but most locals don't consider it the right way to say the name of the city either, except when the references are Orleans Parish, which shares a common border with New Orleans. In an episode of The Simpsons, Marge took part in a musical adaptation of The Tramway called Desire. The character Harry Shearer, a resident of New Orleans, jokingly pronounces the city with both a long sound of e, and with the soft sound of i (New Or-lee-inz). Some of New Orleans' longtime residents pronounce the city's name in a similar way (Nyoo aw-lee-inz), but it's still considered the wrong pronunciation. Typhoonski/Getty Images Since the history and culture of New Orleans is influenced largely by settlers, locals and servants who have been brought to the city to help build and maintain it, the Big Easy is considered a melting pot of many different cultures, much like the United States, but primarily influenced by French, Spanish and African traditions. Since French and Spanish colonists and African slaves played a key role in the creation of New Orleans, their languages remain a significant part of modern culture in the city. In fact, Louisiana Creole is based on a combination of French, Spanish and African dialects. Creole was originally used by French colonists to refer to people born in Louisiana rather than their homeland (France). You will probably come across many restaurants, bars and shops with French, Spanish, Creole and even African names to celebrate this diverse cultural heritage, so when it comes to names of these establishments, you will be to refer to a pronunciation guide from these four languages.
